It was a cold November morning when Li Ming, a shy 13-year-old, sat alone in the school courtyard. He stared at his math test paper — 58/100, another red mark. Tears blurred his vision as he remembered his father's words: "If you fail math again, you'll have to quit the soccer team."

Just then, a voice interrupted him. "Hi! I'm Zhang Lei. Mind if I join you?" A boy with glasses smiled, holding a lunchbox. Before Li Ming could reply, Zhang Lei noticed the test paper. "Oh, fractions(分数)? I used to hate them too! Let me show you a cool trick..."

For the next three weeks, Zhang Lei taught Li Ming every lunch break. They drew pizza slices on napkins to understand fractions and used soccer penalty shootout examples for probability. Slowly, Li Ming's confidence grew.

On the day of the final math test, Li Ming's hands shook until he saw Zhang Lei giving him a thumbs-up from across the classroom. When results came out, Li Ming scored 89 — his highest ever. That afternoon, the two boys celebrated with ice cream, their breath forming little clouds in the winter air.

Have you ever blown on a dandelion clock and watched its seeds fly away like tiny parachutes? Scientists recently discovered an amazing truth: these seeds can generate their own "mini weather" to stay airborne longer!

How it works:

Each seed has a feathery structure called a pappus (冠毛) that acts like a sail. Using high-speed cameras, researchers found that air flows through the pappus' hairs, forming a stable bubble of slow-moving air above the seed. This bubble reduces air resistance, allowing the seed to float 4 times longer than it would without this clever design.

Why it matters:

Natural Engineering: The pappus structure could inspire new designs for tiny drones or air sensors.

Seed Survival: The longer flight helps dandelions spread seeds up to 1 kilometer away.

Climate Clues: Scientists now study how humidity changes the pappus' shape, which may help predict plant migration in warming climates.
